The new line of battle now being formed in France runs along the Valley of the Aisne, where General Von Kluk's forces are defending themselves against the English on his extreme right, and the various French armies in the centre and on his left. The second, third and fourth German armies are falling back on the Aisne from Chalons and Rheims, while further east the fifth German army, under the Crown Prince, has been compelled to move northward and eastward from the Argonne district outside of the range of the Verdun forts. The sixth German army, operating on the Lorraine frontier, is moving back to its base at Metz. South of Verdun the French have relieved Troyon, attacked by the Germans, and are forcing the Crown Prince's rear guards to the north, threatening the German centre with an enveloping movement.

VICTORY FOR CZAR WOULD BIND PEOPLE OF RUSSIA TO HIM

Success for Germany, However, Would Be Dangerous to Government and to Nation's Civilization, Says Correspondent.

By STEPHEN GRAHAM

MOSCOW, Sept. 16,-There is no depression of the national spirit in Russia, There are no strikes, no riots, no revelutionary propaganda or pessimism, but instead an all-pervading cheerfulness and natural unanimity, which even the most optimistic could not have foreseen,

The peasants go to the front with great enthusiasm, and radical and conservative alike cheer them on. Newspapers of all parties are one, and Liberal organa are as loyal as those of Extreme Right, There is the same unanimity among Poles and Jews, and even Jewish volunteer regiments have been formed. The only sympathy with Germany lies instinct to fall into brigandage and rebellion is among the Mohammedan tribesmen of Caucasus. All is well, and if auccess crowns the Russian arms, the empire will become bound in a happy allegiance to the Czar as never before On the other hand, if the Germans gain the upper hand, and inflict vast slaughter. the presence of millions of armed Russians in western Russia is pregnant with culture and position there. This war is in the breasts of the Finns. The only a matter of life and death for Russian civilization, as it is for all the other The air is full of hope. All vodka shops has taken on the appearance of sobriety It has been impossible to obtain alcoholic liquors of any kind, and as a consequence drunkenness has disappeared from the streets, and with it the great army of beggars, who only beg that they may gather a few kopeks for a bottle. The absence of vodka has made a great blank in the peasants' lives, but that blank has been filled up by war and the interest of war. Ordinarily the peasants feel they have nothing to do but drink. but now it is otherwise. It is as if in war they found a real reason for existence-as if in death they found the object of living.

My ears ache with the sound of women's sobs. All the way from the peaceful and happy villages of the Altai the sounds of wailing and crying broke upmy ears. Here, however, in Moscow it is different; some one has wiped away their tears, and the women, with sun-shiny, if tear-stained, faces, are feverishly working for the thousands of wounded who have come back for their Already there are 5000 wounded in Moscow, and they increase at the rate of five trainloads daily. The streets are thronged with Red Cross nurses. In every house women are thinking of what they can do personally for the wounded how many they can take to nurse.

Alas! We are only at the beginning of sorrow, and for the thousands of wounded today there will be tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands a week or a month hence. Even all the care and thought of those at home will be too little to meet the suffering, and many poor soldiers will die without the touch of one skilled or gentle hand. Love for the soldiers is hysterical. the railway stations where the wounded baskets of gifts, and when the huge cross, which marks the ambulance train, comes in and stops, there is a new and sweet invasion, all the girls running along the corridors with cigarettes, tea, augar, cakes and newspapers. Even the German wounded participate in the general hospitality, and you frequently hear Russian women say of a wounded enemy before her; "Poor one; is it his fault he is fighting us?"

The Germans, for their part, are very suspicious, asking if the tea is not vit-riol, refusing to take medicine, and asking: "When are we to be hanged?"
